Self-Evaluation During Practice Teaching

For self-evaluation during the practice teaching phase, student teachers are required to maintain a Reflective Journal, as outlined by the curriculum. This journal, a self-generated and locally standardized daily logbook, is maintained under the guidance of mentors and is envisioned as a tool for reflection and personal growth.

The Reflective Journal serves as a detailed record of the daily experiences student teachers encounter during their school internships. Its primary purpose is to promote "reflection-on-action," encouraging student teachers to critically analyse and assess their teaching practices. The journal highlights how various aspects of teaching are interrelated, providing insight into the integration of theory and practice, the effectiveness of support systems utilized, and an analysis of both successful strategies and areas for improvement.

The journal also allows student teachers to reflect on how they managed challenges, offering space for future planning and corrective actions. Elements such as the integration of theoretical knowledge with practical teaching, the utilization of resources, and the management of successes and failures all contribute to the structure of the Reflective Journal.

A sample of a completed Reflective Journal is attached for reference.
